

Rolling out a new group of bowlers.

A group of students from St Aidan's Anglican Girls School are working to bridge the generation gap with every roll of a bowl. Year 11 physical education students are building an unlikely friendship with Corinda Bowls Club members who are helping the teens brush up on technique during weekly lessons on the green. Bowls head coach Rosey Allan said she hoped the girls would realise the best the sport has to offer as part of a six month partnership with the club. She said the weekly coaching sessions were popular with volunteer club members, who help the students master the bias of the bowl.

“They love working with young people. It is such a refreshing change,” she said. “The girls are beautiful young ladies. They come up and say thank you and they're just so polite. We want them to have fun and experience lawn bowls. “

Ms Allan said she hoped the ongoing relationship with the Corinda school would result in more regular visits by the younger generations. “We're hoping it will encourage families to come to the bowls club, and maybe daughters can play with their mums and dads.”
